approaches. Part study in color and form, part art-as-a-call-to-arms, Neotectonic... is provocative and engaged with the world while still pursuing that ancient goal of producing mesmerizing beauty for its own sake.

The term “neotectonic” refers to the study of motions and deformations of the Earth's crust as they are happening today. As a science, it seeks to understand and predict earthquakes. The discipline also points to the seismic changes occurring under our feet — a nod to other major calamities we face, like climate change, cultural upheaval, the pandemic, and political turmoil.

But Hensel's art is not looking to show us images of these tribulations. Instead, it opens up visions into beauty that allow us to see through the challenges and into a deep well of meaning and, eventually, hope.

At the same time, the folds in the bodies she creates do buckle under forces and appear to morph through collision. In this way, her pieces fulfill the promise of the tectonic activity she names while pursuing the artist's idea of radical beauty.

The Susan Hensel Gallery is happy to present this new exhibit as an online exclusive show as well as an in person show at the Benedictine Center of St. Paul.
